I hate that I have to make a sentence in order to tell you how I feel.

I

Tender. They left and you see both of them dive underwater, the water is thick and their mouths make big, collaborative bubbles. Their mouths grow larger because of the breaths and the order of days no longer matters. A giant sponge fills a room to the brim. Living feels like squeezing yourself through the tight sponge tunnels but the pace suits you. Tender pushes. Familiarity meets the unfamiliar and suddenly you see Dutch houses in Indonesia. He's wearing a young girl's dress with an open back. The dress is black with white rims, made of soft, sporty cotton; it ties around the neck and reaches just so beyond the butt cheek. It might have had some logo in the middle of the chest but you didn't see it. They warn you about dangerous water creatures and toxic plants that inhabit the canals. Air feels moist, it's too warm for the season and buildings seem uninhabited. People whisper to each other on the streets, making deals you question ever coming true.

II

Your hands smell of garlic and you're finally alone. And finally, at last, you let go.
There is no greater truth than what you saw yesterday.
The cigarette burns a hole in your mouth and sadness oozes out

. You know, this will take time, you know.

Horniness is omnipresent, it settles in the little nooks between emotions which surface in words and become hard and you jerk them off and it's easy again, you see each other, you smile. Can we kiss despite my sore throat? We did.

And munching almonds and imposter curry that doesn't arrive.
It's this time of the year when we realise so little is still possible. It's damp and you get blown away but not by possibility but by austerity—a time of survival and holding on (to each other).

I told you things are changing. They are not. It's change that I want.
I want to roll out of this space, fold against new ghhhhhhhhhhhhhhhhhhh different matter. Two years is a career benchmark, three years is a relationship benchmark. Sit on those benches. When talking to Leto I had an image of spheric plateaus floating and overlapping and I'm kinda stuck on it.

Looping. Gummy stretches and rapid contractions. Slow extensions. There is only feeling. In the city there is only work. You either work or consume. I can't sit still. I like how poetry makes me feel. And I would like a tea. It's so clear when you care about someone. When they're not there, there is this dry HOLE in the middle of your body. It's missing them. You wonder what they're doing right now. You wonder what people do when they're alone. Being alone is not regular to you. Does it have much regularity anyway

How does it feel to be left? How does it feel not to be with this person anymore? Is this why he mentioned grieving?

III

i will be walking today.
as my spine pulls i can’t stop myself from gazing at my floppy skin that miraculously reattached to my finger overnight. one can find most magic in the body. there is no overwriting anymore. there is only this pain that centralises your thoughts; pain is the only thing that can take over the negative space. or anger too, maybe? loneliness is the biggest harm. i am also daydreaming about potentially doing a trip to the sea and/or to the mountains (hike). both could be writing trips. i will take many papers. a lot of the times i feel like i carry the incredible skill of stretching time. an hour is infinity, an hour is a minute. i have time for all of you. i do think it's linked to wealth. from now on i only like work that accommodates change of plans.

it's been so long since i've been away.
i'm reiterating, arms stretched in two directions. TAKE ME OUT. embrace locality but how not to suffocate? (like think of the fumes literally.) laughing and orgasming is the only gateway out of pain. what does it tell us, hum?
i love being twelve at a restaurant.
i really don't want to get out of this couch. i see blue sky behind the window. i love being twelve at a restaurant. i have to go. i see blue sky behind the window. i have to go.

this week i learned that limits make growth possible.

IV

You like receiving messages.

You're writing three texts at the same time.

Who will read you?

I can't get Alice Notley out of my head. (the necessity to be in dialogue with established artists before you? to situate yourself in a discourse can be helpful for people to understand what you are aiming at. not everyone is from x) Oh you love making yourself so needed, so flat and necessary, my god, who taught you to weave these thin strings?

On the other side of the bridge the water seems much more normal.

You laugh at yourself, there is other things you're good at. People will forget, they will move on, there is nothing essential about it. But also, you care. And somehow everything lands like an offence or laziness? No, it's more like, confusion, and you're not confused. You know very well what you want and you want this, you're so close to it but it's not yours.

What are you rewriting? Are you further than I thought? Sadness.
I need to talk to someone else anyhow. I'm no longer sure how much to share. I can't see that I'm important to you, we differ. Trained to take up space, take up more time and energy. Bigger and taller. More coffee, more pastries.

The return is blank.
Squishy seats, falling in and out, waking up to a black and white photograph of something very familiar. It's inside-time over here. Immediately something grabs you by the throat. You realise you hate your agenda. How to use it differently? On the bus you wondered about the relation between limits and responsibilities. Does the latter imply the former? Or the other way around? Or both? Thinking feels hard. Clarity is gone. Sandy eyes, nap nap nap. On the other side of the bridge the water seems much more normal.

V

Everyone has gone mad, most of us will not show up. They ask you how your conversations are. You answer in paintings.

(What language could ever accurately represent the touch of a hand or colour).

You would have never thought aesthetics would matter to you this much. Few years ago. You feel the fold of the year, it's like a tongue you made out of dough yesterday and it reminded her of lips.

Two tongues make lips;

...tormenting twists of tassels...Time fucks you up. You return to gazing at the sunset.

Such comfort in the image. These sentences sit at the front of your forehead, they are blurry, you can't reach them, like a tiny fly on your glasses.

You make the image
because you can't reach them but you want to stay in touch but you don't care about being connected to them.
It gives you pleasure to try to reach them. You just want to know they are there.

Isn't that what the image does?
It is.
It's enough that I've seen you once, you'll stay in my head forever.
Sometimes it feels like your body is so small and the globe large and heavy, sitting there on your belly, pressing tenderly.

Your body under the weight of the world. Materiality presses against you and it's pleasant. What comfort is there, in the sense of obesity, in the lack of horizon, just endless curves to caress? Just fullness; like, roll me around and I'll make some imprints with my body and this will make a drawing in the sand and it will get washed away and later I'll make another one. Sometimes life is just eating. Putting the stranger inside of oneself until it becomes familiar again but once it does it flows out of your ass. This ring is spun over and over again. It's funny it came to submission, it's not quite that, it's more like collaboration or,

to the least, being accessible, remaining open.
Holes it is. Being a sponge.
Filling a room. Allowing you to flow through me.
You help me make the images.
You see them too.

VI

Space of enunciation. At times the only way for you to forgive yourself is to pronounce it to them.
Or a glance. Good poetry but his attention didn't catch your frown.
To be upset at a ruined image, to want to return to the memory of yesterday as it was. How to undo understanding.

Pause for business, shift of attention.
We enter the field like always from the west. The light is different over here. I scan the horizon and denote the ones behind me, surprised at their richness. There is a volume of things that took place and I smeared it as experience and it will continue looping as memory.

Not much time is needed for this drowning emotion to take centre stage. So much laughter and so much smiling and so many words exchanged. Actually. / It's a good thing, /

/ these are good times, / / it's been a good year. / I ask everyone,
or at least I try to in my head.

Train ads tell me how to talk to my family, these seems to be quite sensitive times. Are they? We are all here, each one a screen. We are all here but someone is always absent.
I fall asleep on the couch with my legs up, anxious thoughts pressing down my forehead, my body feeling the newness of corduroy, these amazing couches that still feel new and will remain new for many visits to come.

None of us ages here, this house maintains our youths and there is loads of space but somehow - still - the shouting comes through, it's faint but it reaches the kitchen where the cheesecake is being made.

The cheesecake ignores it.
We all get baked in 240. It's jiggly.
It's like we all return to being kids, we nap and make tea and bake and unpack and pack the dishwasher continuously. His incapacity surfaces;

we laugh at their generation.
My news take centre stage, it's fun even though it's kinda strange but I enjoy the call for attention, only possible because you are here.

They are so close now and I feel far.
Is it strange that I like it - I like the sense of separateness, other stuff going on over there, there, somewhere unknown to here.

Food is really important.
Words burn in my mouth.
The chemistry of baking takes centre stage and wins over the chemistry of emotion. Maybe all emotional connection that attempts to be made after trauma is only made possible through cake? An open mouth.

Her digging on the plate and refusing dinner only to eat a bunch of cheese and a bunch of wine but who asked. She wants attention but she can't be looked at. Where is the opinion? The tree got moved outside, it stands there in the distance; it used to take up a whole room.

Abundance takes many shapes.

(Trzyma mnie świeże życie za kciuka.
Czym jest orientacja w terenie ludzkim? *
Rich inner life.
At the edge of fantasy, it is).
What if I'd undress this narrative?
I look back but it's rather in front of me.

Like, in a mirror,
I see myself doing these things, see myself being brash
and loud
and assertive.
There is something so terrifying about choosing.

I tend to attach to movement instead.
What is so violent about a sense of direction?
You step on grass.
The water is boiling.
You’re so nice now, have you always been this way?

Postponement
and binge. Like, I just want to stand in front of you and look at you, now words, now language, it fails us over and over again.
I want to repeat myself endlessly.

Reality can be so schizophrenic but it's actually real nice to see you unleashed like that. It is a cold depth of winter,
I asked them to play but they didn't feel like it.
What is a conversation?

Is it more like a dance or playing ping pong?
Pomidorowa fills my stomach with home and its midnight.
My radiators are hot, my skin tightens.
You told me you've got warm skin and I thought about your warm heart.

(Sometimes it's really nice not to think of yourself as a horrible person).

*Fresh life holds me by the finger. What is orientation when you're on human terrain?
tomato soup

VIII

[Sigh]
Folding within oneself.
The I is a drug.
All I can do is stand.
People around me drop like flies but I keep on showing up, even if it means staring at a wall. Cold foot; an unhappy plant. Places are closing and stories are piled up on planks.

Distributed rhythmically, my arms reaffirm themselves over and over again. Here, in Jackie's words: "Look how life moves, how that movement is so often a moving away from" and "What happened there happened.

It couldn't have happened anywhere else, at any other time.
It was ... an inexplicable synchronicity, an alignment ... a mutual readiness to be open." I'm being held by other bodies around me which reaffirm themselves continually. I am not alone. Do you hear this? You wake up with blood in your mouth and there is dust everywhere.

The skin has been cut and burned and muscles only deepen within their location. There is no horizontality.
You finish a book and I laugh at a sense of tomorrow.
It's a drag, most of it.
Oranges taste great right now, they give the nicest tremble to your body hair. My only hope is to survive through this.

It's a relief to see you like me.
It's a relief to see you are like me.
I'm getting over some feelings, letting them become stale. I can see things changing. Everything squeezes into a corporate suit but you're stubborn in the search for nuance which sometimes takes the shape of periodicals but mostly takes the shape of walks. Sadness is like colour blue filling up your body; it feels like cold blood. The only continuous task of the month is heating yourself up, melting what have become hard muscles and cartilages, rough skins and dried out saliva. It's not like I don't want to be in my body, more that my body doesn't want to be

me,

here.

Point a finger into the place you speak from. Point to a place in your home where you don't have to compromise. Point to a place where lost feelings get stored. Point to those moments when you truly, unabashedly, felt fitted and held and it wasn't about what you'd respond or what you'd make up, because you were being created irl.

(Green helps).

Jackie's words come from pages 178 and 179 of 'Alien Daughters Walk Into the Sun.'

IX

sun was setting and so was i - my hands are so dry - i open a beer - okay but hold your hand out, i am still here - i await your message - ask me things; hold me - don't let me slip through the potential of silence and distance - i am still here. - the name might be different, the land has changed, i cry on these shoulders and they ask me for my id - i show it to them - i don't look them in the eyes - it's over, you lost your chance, you're facing weeks of non-work, what would this be? - let's hang out together ('sick woman theory') - let's slide into that place of hanging out and hanging out where work doesn't necessarily exist - all these rotating changes and thoughts and windows into new worlds, they are all here - we grow closer together, we begin to smell alike - all the while she wants to hunt me down - they called this love a poison and you agreed

- it's state-altering and it's nice - you glance at them from across the room, their body making 8s and Ss
- you've seen each other before, that is, if they see you at all - what a similarity it is to be in the same room over and over again - like a time hole but more of a · slip ·
You regain a body. The part of flesh that was theirs crawls back into you. There is now an under-muscle. Blood-flow accelerates.

The first moment you notice this is when they take you to a Brazilian bar and you get the buffet option.
Eternal warmth overtakes over, you are being filled by love in bites.

Friends take you on long walks into unknown destinations of thought.
There are homes and oranges, banana breads, silver tops and homesteads.
You get into that space where you dream together, where dreaming means drawing a version of the present that crystallises when you sit squeezed together on a bed. The lids grow heavier and you fall on their shoulders, you are held just the way you've been held back then. There is nothing you need, there is nothing you want. More. Than.

This.
